On Saturday, McClatchy reported that Khalifa Hifter, a former Gaddafi military officer, was appointed to lead the rebel army supported by the United Nations, the United States and the Globalist Coalition.

Hifter spent two decades living in suburban Virginia where he established a life but maintained ties to anti-Gaddafi groups, writes Chris Adams for the newspaper. A friend told the journalist he was unsure exactly what Hifter did to support himself, and that Hifter primarily focused on helping his large family.

As it turns out, Mr. Hifter is a CIA operative, which likely explains his lengthy stay in Virginia. In 1996, the Washington Post reported that a Col. Haftar (a variation on Hifter) had arrived in the United States and he was reported to be the leader of a contra-style group based in the U.S. called the Libyan National Army, the Wisdom Fund noted at the time. This group is supported by the U.S., and has been given training facilities in the U.S. It's a good presumption that Col. Haftar's group operates in Libya with the blessings of our government.
