

Europeans are taking a tougher line on immigration than their leaders - Nigel Farage MEP

14/02/2017 13:13 by webmaster

The European Union has no future at all in its current form.

Press Release

Today in the European Parliament in Strasbourg on the "Future of the EU" debate Nigel Farage MEP pointed out to European leaders that their voters are taking far harder positions on issues than they are. Voters want less Europe and less immigration from Muslim countries, and this will lead to the global 2016 revolution continuing into 2017.

Nigel Farage MEP stated: "But at the heart of it is a fundamental point, Mr Verhofstadt this morning said that people want more Europe; they don't, the people want less Europe. And we see this again and again when people have referendums and they reject aspects of EU membership."

"Just twenty percent want us to keep on allowing people in from Muslim countries, which means your voters have a harder line position on this than Donald Trump, or myself or frankly any party sitting in this Parliament and that is where we're going.

"The fact is the European Union has no future at all in its current form and I suspect you're in for as bigger shock in 2017 as you were in 16."

Transcript:

I feel like I'm attending a meeting of a religious sect here this morning, it's as if the global revolution of 2016; Brexit, Trump, the Italian rejection of the referendum has completely bypassed you.

You can't face up to the fact that this bandwagon is going to roll across Europe in these elections in 2017. A lot of citizens now recognise this form of centralised government simply doesn't work. Whether it's the miseries inflicted upon a country like Greece by the euro, the unemployment caused by bad regulation or the feeling that none of us are as safe in our cities because of the disastrous Common Asylum Policy.

But at the heart of it is a fundamental point, Mr Verhofstadt this morning said that people want more Europe; they don't, the people want less Europe. And we see this again and again when people have referendums and they reject aspects of EU membership.

But something more fundamental is going on out there. Yes you can say they're lying, and I have no doubt that many of you here when you hear what I have to say will probably despise your own voters.

Because just last week, Chatham House, the reputable group, published a massive survey from ten European member states and only twenty percent of people want immigration from Muslim countries to continue. Just twenty percent want us to keep on allowing people in from Muslim countries, which means your voters have a harder line position on this than Donald Trump, or myself or frankly any party sitting in this Parliament and that is where we're going.

And I simply cannot believe that you're blind to the fact that even Mrs Merkel has now made a U-turn and wants to send people back. Even Mr Schulz thinks that it's a good idea, the fact is the European Union has no future at all in its current form and I suspect youâ€™re in for as bigger shock in 2017 as you were in 16.